Eating Healthy Costs

Yes, organic foods are more expensive because they become rancid more quickly and are more costly to grow without pesticides and steroids compared to non-organic foods. There is no way to get around that if you feel the need to shop for organic foods. In my experience though, many folks think that grocery shopping is more expensive than eating out at fast food restaurants, spending $150 as opposed to spending $5-10 per meal. In actuality, eating out almost always makes the day less cost-effective than preparing food from home.

Compare a turkey sandwich made at home to a 12-inch hero from XYZ Sub Shop. Most subs cost about 5-6 dollars for the equivalent of 6 portions of bread and 6-ounces of turkey. That's what most 12-inch subs provide. If you shop at the commissary or local grocery store a loaf of whole-wheat bread is about two dollars and a pound of turkey is about $3 (16 ounces). That means six portions of bread from that loaf equals 60 cents and six ounces of meat costs $1.12. A grand total of $1.72 for several homemade sandwiches compared to one sub from a sub shop. The key to cost-effective shopping is to take the initial food shopping “hit”, paying what seems like a lot and start saving money while eating healthy.
